期刊文章:以Reinforcing Participatory Governance Through International Human Rights Obligations of Political Parties为例

Highlight

Contemporary human rights law has seen direct international obligations extended to armed groups and businesses. This Article argues that international human rights obligations are crystallizing with respect to a further category of nonstate actor, political parties, albeit only in relation to political participation rights. After briefly examining the largely procedural nature and scope of those rights under international law, this Article surveys existing international and transnational sources of obligations of political parties, including both those in power and in opposition. In an effort to buttress these sources and encourage their proliferation, this Article then considers rationales for such obligations, building in part upon the rationales for human rights obligations of businesses and armed groups. Finally, the Article offers some thoughts on possible means of implementing political parties' emerging international obligations in respect of political participation rights.

Introduction

Footnotes (脚注), 文献交叉引用

States have traditionally stood alone as subjects of international law. Modern practice and scholarship have extended international legal personality or status, in varying degrees, to international organizations, individuals, armed groups, and businesses. 12 Political parties have not figured in this expansionary process, yet they are natural bearers of direct international obligations corresponding to political participation rights--essentially, the rights to vote and to stand in free, periodic elections--as enshrined in all major international human rights instruments, and as discussed further in [*148] Part [. 2 Though largely overlooked by scholarship, 3 such obligations are arguably already crystallizing with respect to political parties.
